Using research, either in the form of quoting or paraphrasing an author, strengthens the validity of an argument. When we, members of an academic community, use research, we show evidence of having academic integrity. Academic integrity is the notion that we gain knowledge from the ideas of others; we must then be responsible for crediting other scholars for the ideas that we learn from them. It is absolutely necessary to be honest about the information we learn from others and to cite the sources of those authors who teach us.
